Reflections and Recollections, Part 1 Four years ago, on June 7, 2010, I found out that my partner, Rod Blagojevich, had been released from prison to serve the remainder of his original 8-year sentence, and that the day before, he'd been released on parole. It was almost as though he had stepped into a movie that I knew already had a line. I'd first met Rod in 2005. He needed someone to run for a U.S. Senate seat in Illinois after being appointed governor by then-President-elect Barack Obama after the impeachment of and conviction for his predecessor, Gov. George Ryan. It was a long shot. I didn't think I could win, but I figured I'd learn a lot. Instead, I became involved with someone else during the campaign, but as time passed, we reunited, and later on, we married. After more public tumult, the Obama administration appointed him to the senate seat and he was elected. That was a long time ago. I was then engaged to another guy, but when he found out he was being transferred from Chicago to Tampa, and then to the notorious detention center in Coleman, Florida, I knew Rod would be even harder to get out of my life. I knew he was going to be released in July 2010. But I
